

Dangerous Distinction

I have not sent out a newsletter in a while, because the issues surrounding 12 Round Enterprises have been significant and a lot of what needs to be said here can also be said on the blog, so I defer to it as being more easily accessible to more people.

But, like now, it is important to say what can be said with a little more candor.

Allowing ourselves to be shut away in our homes, our businesses closed, our lives regulated by the state is a mistake. It is something we might have done on our own, without state orders and that fine line is the crux of the issue and the dangerous distinction between right and wrong.

Had things not been state ordered, what I think would have happened is those who could remain at home and still do their jobs remotely, would have. Schools could have gone online and actually should have long ago, with parent-approved curriculum, rather than the state-ordered curriculum that makes our children accept liberal and communist principles in order to pass their classes and graduate. Online higher education has been effective for nearly a generation.

Church, on the other hand, is not the same. It is a Christian expectation that those of the flock will gather together. Matthew 18:20 says: "Where two or three gather in my name, I am with them." Common sense can dictate the distance one keeps from others or the judicious use of self-mitigating practices. But, common sense is the one thing the liberal and communist education curriculums try desperately to eradicate. Communism doesn't work logically, to common sense it is irrational so common sense is the one thing that must be done away with.

There are two ways of thinking of things. One is that the distribution and proliferation of good information allows a free people to make good decisions concerning their individual lives and circumstances. The other is to believe that the government must dictate that which it deems is best for the people and enforce it with law and the use of force.

In this crisis, we have gone completely to the second method of governance. That method ignores individual circumstance and treats all citizens the same. America was built on the concept that we are individuals, each capable of making individual choices that serve their circumstances best.

The first method assumes logical and intelligent thought. The second method assumes an inability to think at all.

In the interest of public safety, many have tolerated the lockdown, but that limited leash is reaching its end. Michigan has found a way to resist the communist nature of its governor and that method of resistance should continue and grow across the nation, putting more and more pressure on the oppressive governments to rescind their communist orders.

It does not undo the damage already done. By once forfeiting the right to make such decisions on our own, we cannot reclaim them without force. That is the ultimate question to be answered by patriots. We have now seen communism demonstrated on these shores, the black hand of Marx spread throughout the states. We have enough evidence of their intent and their methods to determine what they have in mind. It is ours to start dismantling these forces peacefully, or not.
